GRANT'S DAUGHTER NELLIE

A Popular American Girl Whose English Husband Made Her Life Unhappy.

She Lives Quietly in a Fashionable London District, Mixing Little in Society, and Devoting Herself to Her Children.

Some people are born into the world to be tenderly and familiarly spoken of, and Nellie Grant is one of them. To the American people she will always be "Nellie Grant." So she was known to the men who served under her father and saw her, a shy little dark-eyed girl in extraordinarily wide skirts, with hair abnormally flat and smooth over her ears, clinging to her mother's hand when she visited her soldier father in camp. So she was known when she was growing from girlhood to womanhood as the darling of the White House. So she has been remembered while most people forgot her husband's name, and so she will be called when she is a gentle, white-haired old woman with grandchildren at her knees.

Americans do not approve of foreign marriages, however brilliant, for American girls. As a nation we look with suspicious and disapproving eye on any foreigner who carries off one of our girls, and we follow her fortunes with almost menacing solicitude. Not one among the many lovely American girls who have crossed the sea to grace English homes was parted with so grudgingly and doubtingly as was Nellie

Nor were the forebodings feelish. It was not long before rumors came floating over that Nellie Grant was not a happy wife; rumors that were denied until the flagrant disregard for her by Sartoris in connection with Blanche Melbourne made denial useless, and brought about admitted separation. Oddly enough this woman, who was the immediate cause of the separation, was an American also, a schoolmate of mine in St. Louis, where I used often to neglect my lessons to admire her over the top of my book-a beautiful, soulless creature.

Now, Sartoris is dead, and the sharpness of the pain he caused Nellie Grant will turn to the sorrow without resentment that the finality of death mepires. It will bring no other change to her, for they were living their lives quite apart, and, aside from her disappointment in him, hers is a hap-py, peaceful one.

She has a charming little house of her own in London, No. 66 Cadogan Place, in the fashionable West End. It is a brightlooking, three-story and basement brick house with a little vine covered verands in front. When one calls the most solemn and respectful of model menservants conducts one up the pretty oak staircase to the drawing rooms on the second floor. They are bright, cheery, sunny rooms, with white and gold woodwork and soft tints of terra cotta and dull blue in the furnishings, with fine paintings on the walls, an open piano in the back room and a comfort-conferring open fire in the front room. It is a dainty home, with an air of quiet refinement and suggestive of artistic taste. Here she lives quietly with her children -her son, Algernon Edward, a well-grown, manly lad, nearly sixteen years old and tailer than his mother, and her two little girle, Vivian May and Rosemary.

She entertains a little and goes out a little. She doesn't mix much with that "smart" set that keeps the ball dizzily spinning instead of rolling, but she gatharound her dinner table and her drawingroom the best people in London, English and American; and when she goes out she is received more as the daughter of a President of the United States than as Mrs. Sartoris.

Her taste turns to art; she rarely misses & "private view;" her acquaintance with artistic and literary people is wide, and one of her oldest and best friends is the famous president of the Royal Academy, Sir Frederic Leighton. She possesses two of the very few landscapes he has painted, and he has made a portrait of her and a faithful sketch of the back of her head. Little Vivian May has posed for him.

Nellie Grant is a vastly more attractive woman now than she was when, eighteen years ago, she went to England as a hopeful bride. She was only nineteen then and unformed, notwithstanding the educational and social advantages she had. She was a pretty, blooming, raw girl, with a sweet disposition then-not very different from hundreds of other pretty American girls.

Notwithstanding she has a boy taller than herself she doesn't look over thirty now. She is below the medium height, with a pretty figure, neither stout nor slender, and in a roomful of generously-proportioned English women looks petite. When she goes out in the evening she usually wears white with graceful lace draperies. Her face is of girlish smoothness and fullness, with a tinge of color in the cheeks that deepens to a ripe red in the lips. Her eyes are very dark in the shadow of long lashes, and ber hair is almost black. She has an indolent repose of manner that with her low, sweet voice is wonderfully restful, but above all her attractions is her sweetness of manner -a sort of sympathetic gentleness that makes her a most winsome woman. She is devoted to her children. The boy is away at school. His two heroes are his illustrious grandfather and the first Napoleon, and any boy who would undertake to convince him that they were not the greatest men that lived would be apt to need poultices on his anatomy after the attempt. He has read "General Grant's Memoirs," everything that he can find in history relating to him, and never tires hearing his mother tell of him, while his Napoleonic knowledge is as complete as writers can make it. The little girls, Vivian May and Rosemary, of thirteen and eleven years, respectively, are being educated at home, as is the English custom, and in their simple smocked frocks, with their flowing hair. look more childish than little girls of the same age on this side. Vivian May, the elder, looks like Elaine might have looked. She has a beautiful face, with regular features, rose-leaf tinting and big, clear blue eyes, framed in soft, fair bair. She nurses an ardent hope in her youthful heart that she will some day be an actress, and she has shown a decided talent in that direction, She comes by her inclination and talent naturally, for Mr. Sartoris's mother was a daughter of Charles Kemble and a sister of Fannie Kemble. Mrs. Sartoris takes pride in and fosters her little daughter's taste, and perhaps some day it may come to pass that we will go to see General Grant's granddaughter as Juliet or Rosalind. Rosemary is a brown, piquant, witty lit-tle girl, fond of books and play, with a look of practical good sense in her critical eyes and around her firm little mouth. The children have been in America only once, I think, and even that was a difficult matter to arrange, their stay being limited to a certain, exact time, and the visit being made on parole, as it were. Sartoris siways had the privilege of visiting them.

During a stay in London I spent part of a Mrs. Bettie Wharton is at Wirt...Mrs. M. Baer, to a certain, exact time, and the visit being made on parole, as it were. Sartoris slways had the privilege of visiting them.

Grant (as she is always best known here). and chatting over our tea I asked her if she ever thought of coming to America to

"Sometimes I think I would like to," she said, "but I don't think I shall ever do so. In fact I couldn't take my children." (This on account of Sartoris). "Then all my friends are here. I have been away from America so long that those who were my friends hardly remember me. I like living here. It is very pleasant, and I am of such indolent nature that I can't bear to even think of making a change. No. I think I will never go back to live. I shall always make my home here.

"I don't go out much now; just enough to keep up an acquaintance. During the sea-son two nights a week for a ball, or party, or dinner is all I try to do. I am saving myself for the time when I'll have to take my little girls out—when I'll have to play the chaperon," and she beamed fondly on the little girls that are the good cheer of the household.
